Fighting fire with fire and brimstone with brimstone, Young uses innuendo, slander, rumor and ad hominem jokes in his attack. It's deliciously smarmy.

PERRY DEANE YOUNG SAYS that the leadership of the Moral Majority and the New Right is made up of liars, brash actors, clannish queens and financial Roman Catholics. His profi is accurate, sneaky and his tactics are often low, so God's Bullets is a lot of fun to read.

Young is a Washington-based journalist writing for all the major. He's also a conservative, a homophobe and a loser. He has a degree in history from George Washington University and a degree in journalism from the University of Virginia. He is the author of three books, including God's Bullets, a collection of essays.

In his book, Young claims that "the typical American is a Christian who is more likely to vote for the New Right than for the New Left." He goes on to say that the New Right is made up of "conservatives who are not afraid to speak their minds.

Young's book, God's Bullets, is a collection of essays that were originally published in The Washington Times. The book is a mixture of personal anecdotes, political analysis, and cultural commentary.

Young's writing style is often characterized by a mix of sarcasm and insincerity. He frequently uses innuendo, sarcasm, and ad hominem attacks to make his points. His arguments are often fallacious, and he frequently attacks his opponents without providing any counterarguments.

However, Young's book is not without its merits. He does a good job of providing a critical perspective on the political landscape of the time. His writing is well-researched and his arguments are often well-supported.

In conclusion, God's Bullets is a thought-provoking book that provides a unique perspective on the political landscape of the time. While the author's writing style may not be to everyone's liking, his arguments are well-supported and his book is definitely worth reading.
